The fact that you were fired isn't the deal breaker — it's how you handle it that is. Believe it or not, employers don't look as negatively on candidates who have been fired from jobs as they do on candidates who have voluntarily quit jobs. This doesn't mean they look favorably on it either, so you shouldn't approach a resume or job interview without thinking about how you're going to handle ...

This is why most people are under the false assumption that, "If I have nothing to hide, I have nothing to worry about." As a practicing criminal defense attorney for more than two decades, I can say you could have a lot to worry about if you open your big mouth, even if you are actually innocent. You might not get all the facts right.
